COLOUR TIPS

The only way to accurately select suitable paint colours is to test swatches on the surface to be painted. The way a colour reacts is dependent largely on light, which can change a colour drastically, either animating it by warming it up or by softening it with a subtle bluish cast to cool it down. Colour is also affected by other surfaces in the room it reflects off.

Nature conditions us to expect: the darkest value at our feet, the medium value at eye level, and the lightest value above us. To create interest and contrast consider Warm and cool colours, Light and dark, Bright and dull, Smooth and textured

In most successful colour schemes, one colour is dominant, one is subordinate, and one is for accent or trim. Avoid clashes. Your eye and gut will know! If you grit your teeth or get a knot in your stomach, don't use it!

Colour is a chameleon, it changes depending on adjacent colours, White or beige will take on the tint of an adjacent colour and differing adjacent colours will appear more intense.

Generally.....

- Cool colours and tints will make a space appear larger and Warm colours and shades will make a space appear smaller (and sometimes smaller is desirable)
- Cool colours and tints make an object appear smaller and lighter in weight and Warm colours and shades make an object appear larger and heavier
- Contrasting colours contract space and Similar colours or values expand space
- White, grey or colourless spaces are poor choices where people are to gather and interact and can have a dampening effect on the level or quality of conversation
- Time seems to pass more quickly in warm spaces and more slowly in cool spaces
- Temperature is perceived as hotter in warm spaces and colder in cool spaces
- Warm colours and earth tones encourage and maintain body warmth and physical action
- Cool colours are conducive to mental activities, project and research

Exercise extreme care in using white for highly illuminated spaces as it can create glare and headaches and it's easier to make mistakes
